

MEDIA RELEASE

Monday 12 February 2007

'Boomers' chancing love over the internet - first Aussie over 50s social network website launched

With more and more people logging onto the internet to find companionship, friendship or love, a new Australian website targeting over 50's – www.forever-young-club.com.au - was launched this week.

With an ageing population, longer life spans and increasing numbers of cashed-up baby boomers going through relationship breakdowns, turning 50 or even 60 can present many Australians with a whole new outlook and range of life choices.

The brainchild of several Australian, energetic '50 somethings', www.forever-young-club.com.au was developed due to an increasing number of mature people looking to socialise with people their own age.

Key founder and spokesperson for www.forever-young-club.com.au Mike Ramsay said not only is the baby boomer market far more technology-savvy than most marketers appreciate, they are also populous, asset-rich, demanding and the least straight-laced generation of over 50's ever seen.

"There was an obvious gap in the market for an online meeting place targeting boomers – particularly one that understands people over 50 who don't see themselves as 'senior citizens' but vibrant, healthy, active participants in life. The majority of people over 50 want to develop relationships with people of their own generation - they have a real sense of camaraderie about their life experiences and appreciate the substance of relationships with someone else in the over 50 bracket," Ramsay said.

KPMG partner and demographer Bernard Salt said there are now 492,000 single 60-somethings in Australia, comprised of those who have chosen never to marry as well as the separated, divorced and widowed. Over the next decade boomers will fully colonise their 60s and the single-and-60 market will grow by 228,000.

Australian Bureau of Statistics figures showed mean discretionary household income per person was significantly higher in the 45 to 64 bracket than the 15 to 34 bracket. Between 2001 and 2011, spending by mature consumers 55+ will grow by a marked 61%, which is twice the national average.*

"As the first baby boomers approach 60 – with many more to come over the next years – marketers need to appreciate they don't see themselves as 'ageing'. They are, in fact, 'forever young'. And forget about calling them 'seniors' – the assumption will be you are talking about their parents!" Ramsay said.

"It's only in the early stages, but initial responses have been strong with several businesses looking to form alliances with us. We are aiming to develop the site as the premier social network for Australians over 50 offering a range of lifestyle solutions, special interest forums and events."

www.forever-young-club.com.au was created in 2006 with an all encompassing theme of 'Loving Life over Fifty.' The site aims to provide a safe, friendly and comfortable forum for Australians over 50 to meet, chat and find companionship over the Internet. Premium membership rates start at $25 per month, $65 per quarter or $210 for 12 months. For more information or to register for a FREE trial email info@forever-young-club.com.au or visit www.forever-young-club.com.au.

<ends>

For interview opportunities contact:

Kath Christie or Jennifer Cromarty, br&new pr T: 03 9292 8922/ 0413 241 033
kath@brandnew.net.au